In recognition of their unfailing and scholarly assistance, which facilitated our early observations, we dedicate this, the completed record of our experiments to

The Class of Nineteen Twelve

Preface

IT has been in the ever strengthening conviction that the experiences of individuals assembled for purposes of educational improvement can be most profitably studied from a psychological point of view, that this book has been prepared. The experiences of the group of subjects studied and the experiments made upon them have been recorded with care under the tutelage of those whose names are immediately hereafter enumerated.

The editors wish to thank the members of the Board first listed for the opportunities offered for experimentation. We wish also to express our gratitude to the persons of the second group for the constant interest in the results of the experimentation and for the kindly and illuminating criticism during the intermediate processes through which the subjects became normal adults.

Child Psychology

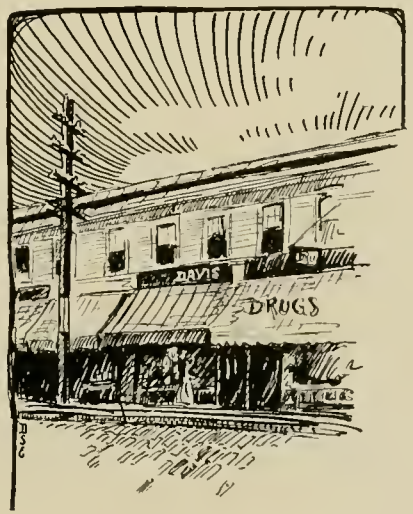
THE data for this commentary were gathered from observations of a selected group of subjects brought together at an early age and studied under scientific conditions. The effort has been made to give an exact and technical statement of the characteristic tendencies displayed by the subjects under given conditions.

During the earliest period in their new environment, the subjects showed characteristics common to all young children. It was inferred from their actions that their consciousness was vague and disjointed; but its exact state cannot be definitely known since the subjects were incoherent and inarticulate. Their actions were for the most part reflex or instinctive, as, for example, the tendency to cry on all occasions. This frequent weeping had little or no genuine emotional significance, although many subjects reacted to music[1] with tears and other expressions of nervous excitement.

Another type of action early shown was instinctive gymnastic reaction to a sharp command, when subjects unhesitatingly went so far as to cast themselves upon the floor, indulging, as is habitual with young children, in strange bodily distortions. Although their actions appeared uncoordinated, periodic examinations[2] of these subjects showed them to be in increasingly excellent physical condition.



At an early date important clinics were held by the two leading organizations of the institution with a view to noting the first religious[3] and terpsichorean[4] tendencies of the subjects. On these occasions imitation of the more adequate activities of the older members of the society in which they found themselves appeared to furnish the keynote to their actions. One striking example of the power of this instinct will not be out of place. On a certain occasion a group of older subjects provided picturesque musical entertainment for the amusement of the young children. Highly pleased, the more youthful subjects after painful preparation produced an exact imitation of the affair; exercising their vocal talents vigorously. This was noteworthy as the first occasion when the subjects gave vent to public speech, and they showed a marked tendency to stammer in an exceedingly nervous though cheerful fashion.[5] At this time, also, they afforded a striking example of the attraction for the young of brilliant colors, by decorating themselves with random bits of green cambric. This touch of originality was again displayed on a later occasion, in view of the athletic nature of which the subjects refrained from binding their knees.

Education was, of course, the most important feature of the experimentation. The subjects were rigorously taught to spell; their interest in science was stimulated by reiterated lectures on the habits of the anophelus and culex mosquitoes.

From the first, however, beneficial amusement was offered: the subjects were trained in barn dancing and provided royally with theatrical entertainment.[6] It was long before the subjects outgrew the fancies of childhood; late in this first stage of their development, they took great pleasure in fairy stories, and proudly appeared in costumes representing the characters of Lewis Carroll's classic myth.[7] Moreover they indulged with childlike enthusiasm in May-time games and sports, evincing a keen delight in their simple and youthful apparel.

At length came the great day when the children were considered ready for advancement to a higher plane. Now, as a proof of their fitness, yet with a lingering admiration of the dream-like and mystic, they displayed their ability to dance gracefully, performed various horticultural rites with musical accompaniment[8] and spoke in public for the first time without stammering.[9] It was this ability to act independently that brought them to that realization of their own unquestionable importance which led them naturally to the second stage of growth.

Mob Psychology

UPON entering their second stage, the subjects showed at first a tendency toward further development of some of their earlier symptoms. A slightly changed environment had its reactions in timid and childlike behavior. They still showed a tendency to move incoherently; they rushed wildly about; the impulse to cry frequently led to wild screaming in the halls of residence.[1] Self-restraint in all its forms, as set forth in the Grey Book, was as yet almost unknown to them. But the presence of a new group of subjects in the lower stage produced a reaction of aggressiveness and self-confidence; this was manifested in elevators and recitation-rooms by an unmistakeably "important" manner; and later on, when many of the subjects were given to wearing numbers marking their status, their pride and self-confidence increased visibly. By this time, too, a new motive developed,—that of spiritus classis. As an organized body they moved, distinct from others,—quorum habebant. Fired by this new impulse of organization, they sought to carry it into all activities.

As the consciousness of organization developed, motor coordination took the place of uncoordination. Their movements now showed a definite purpose. They learned not only to control themselves but to control others. As an organized police patrol in time of excitement they proved most valuable. In small groups they patrolled the grounds of the institution, keeping most careful guard even in remote corners;—the spot light of investigation was sometimes thrown in surprising places. The facts which these researches brought to light were later published conspicuously as an example to future generations. Later they extended their labors over the surrounding country, evincing utmost hope, although all others had lost faith in the project, and finally bringing to light a beloved former member of the institution—the guardian of the South Porch. The value of this discovery to posterity can hardly be overestimated; therefore the event was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies. Spiritus classis ruled the day.

But although organized and extremely spirited, the subjects showed that they were not as yet fully developed. The characteristics commonly attributed to crowds became apparent in their behavior. In all cases they seemed swayed by the emotions, and very easily excited. An example is here appropriate. On one occasion all nature was apparently calm and quiet; the community at large was not aware of any undue circumstances; yet these subjects were quickly stirred by an apparently simple object—a hearse—and as a few gave way to the reaction of wailing, the whole group rushed madly to an isolated spot, and there, shielding their rash behavior from all prying eyes, they hastily buried the text-book of their earlier life—the ladder by which they had risen.[1] Although not a matter of record, it is to be questioned whether these subjects did not in after life regret this rash deed, for younger generations might have profited much by the aforesaid ladder.

Even later in this stage, fragments of the incoherent rushing about still remained. The simple rumor of a few upper-classmen leaving for Boston was enough to send the whole group into hysteria. Automobiles were viewed with suspicion, and often wildly followed, on bicycles or on foot.[2] Collective hallucinations in a crowd are common; this crowd was no exception to the rule. A celebrated case on record occurred when a large group of these subjects mistook a young woman in a white sweater for a box of books, and fancied it smelled the scent of burning sulphur in the upper air, when according to very good testimony, no such phenomenon existed.[3]

With further development, the spiritus classis increased its work: a competition in group-singing took place at which these subjects distinguished themselves by their recognition of the value of tradition and erudition. Behind real footlights and beneath real rouge they truthfully represented scenes from Scottish life, for the instruction of those younger subjects still in childhood. It was observed, too, that they flocked in crowds to the various small buildings now open to them weekly. Although some of them had never before entered these precincts, they characteristically appeared perfectly at ease, so completely had they succeeded in suppressing the impulse to timidity. After a few weeks of this process, they developed the power of discrimination, and of making fine distinctions among these various places. Gradually they were led to form small groups of their own, instead of merely acting as members of the large mob. It was this power of selection and the instinct toward grouping by congeniality which testified to the development of the subjects under this experiment, and prepared them for the third stage.

Social Psychology

IN the third stage the value of the experiments became increasingly evident, since the subjects reacted to the various stimuli more promptly and with greater concentration. There developed in the individual mind instincts which have an important bearing on social relations. The gregarious instinct, for example, which is of immense social importance, was manifested in the habits formed by the subjects of moving in groups—groups which were of various sizes and united for different purposes. Some were formed for the development of reasoning, thought, and language, while others merely aimed at enjoyment of a gustatory nature.[1] Several groups of about fifty each seemed to be especially well united for purposes which were somewhat similar but mutually exclusive. The formation of these groups was by a process complicated and arbitrary. Individuals in this process of assimilation betrayed certain characteristics of uneasiness: they confessed to having dreams of walking into strange houses which rapidly changed into other similar houses, but in every case the subjects finally experienced the altruistic emotion of happiness through shared happiness.[2] Among the members of these groups, the instincts of acquisition and construction became noticeable. The individuals acquired certain insignia of the groups which increased at first their consciousness of self-importance; they acquired new places of rendezvous to which they daily repaired; they soon set about in construction and enlargement of these dwellings to meet their increasing needs.[3]

In this stage the fraternal instinct first became noticeable. The subjects showed affection for the newest objects of experimentation which was violently reciprocated, and the bond which was formed between the two groups bade fair to continue into the adult stage. The relations between them fostered mutual support and, on the one side, guidance through the difficult mazes of the experiment. Amusement of the younger ones was also part of the task assigned. In doing this, the instinct of imitation manifested itself to some extent, these subjects, however, exhibiting a marked inventiveness in the working out of the impulse. Rhythm and melody were introduced into the occasion, and by means of cherry blossoms and fans the imaginations of the youthful ones were transported to scenes in distant lands. The exhibition of this play instinct was attended with marked success. It is interesting to note the increased efficiency of this instinct as the development had proceeded. In the first stage the subjects had imitated without alteration the entertainment provided for them; in this stage they manifested originality.

The instinct of habit also played a large part in the behavior of the subjects in this stage. An interesting book on social psychology says: "A custom once established, the practice of it always becomes in some degree an end in itself."[1] So these subjects contemplated the performance of certain time-honored rites; after exhibition of their powers of persuasion on this burning question they were granted permission; whereupon they proceeded to perform the ceremony with a speed almost inconceivable to the human mind, baffling all investigation. Other members of the community set out to prevent the affair. They reported cases where subjects had appeared now with the characteristics of human beings, and now of bears or Trojan horses. In the attempt to solve these cases of dual personality the investigators caused themselves to be rapidly translated through space,[2] always reacting to the sight of any small group of people with gruff, monotonous noises.[3]

The instinct manifested by the subjects in question at this time was that of pugnacity, which is of immense importance in social development. This attitude was marked toward the persons who were endeavoring to baffle the contemplated ceremony. It was in the interests of protection, both of the members of the group in question and of the younger members of the community who were at the mercy of the mob. However, as soon as the desired ends were accomplished, the subjects succeeded in suppressing this instinct, as it detracted from the peace and harmony of the community as a whole.

At length the subjects had stood all the tests set by those interested in this stage of their development. Their mental activity had preserved their numbers nearly intact, while their social activity had greatly increased the esteem in which the group was held. To be sure, the thought that they were soon to assume the chief power caused the subjects to experience a sensation of dizziness. But upon closer examination of their own number, splendid leaders were found, and so the group proceeded, anticipating with delight the sensation of seeing their fellow-subjects occupying the seats of the mighty.

"Memories of Wellesley, what will they be?
We can only fancy, vaguely foresee.
Vespers in the chapel dim
With music soft and low.
The shadowy lake on a moonlight night,
Paddlers paddling slow."

Normal Adult Psychology

FOLLOWING the natural sequence we now turn to the fourth stage in our psychological development, that of the normal adult. Various phenomena are to be noted in this class of subjects, who, far from being abnormal, displayed the logical results of heredity and early environment. It must be remembered that this group in passing from childhood through the intermediate stages had been subjected to all well-known and some hitherto untried processes of training. It is therefore peculiarly profitable to examine the results as seen in the normal adult.

One of the first things to be noted is the marked change in temperament and conduct which took place at this time. The subjects insisted, in spite of inclement weather, upon donning the insignia[1] of their newly acquired rank. Not content with inspiring awe by their advanced mental ability, they sought to subdue those beneath them by the solemnity of their attire. A desire for quiet now made itself known.

Probably their advanced age was the cause of their constant attempts to secure silence. It is also likely that the vast amount of work to be creditably accomplished necessitated their frequent admonishing of those less developed.[2] In accordance with their dignity a decrease in the passion for violent exercise[3] was noted, and attention was concentrated upon the nobler gymnastics of intellectual achievement.[4] It was now that the subjects began to talk gravely on such topics as self-restraint, omission of academic appointments, attendance at religious exercises, and walking on the grass. We observed, too, that reticence[5] in public speaking disappeared (this was undoubtedly due to practice in the spoken language[6]), and the use of the phrase "hearty support and cooperation" became an almost reflex action. Originality despite tradition became the motto in all things.[7]

As the close of the first period drew near, the normal beings, exhausted by the length and exactitude of the experiments, found immediate rest urgent, and many were permitted to leave the clinic at an early date. Careful observation and collection of statistics revealed the facts that the subjects returned from their brief retirement, greatly improved in reserve force and wardrobe. While it could not be ascertained how the period of absence had been employed or how great had been the resistance to those elemental taste experiences which were so demoralizing at the laboratory,[8] it was noted that after this time various individuals lost their interest in vocational training and discussed domestic economy.

At this stage the subject showed a strange reaction from the reposeful dignity of their previous habits. Not even the proximity of tests of fitness brought them back to their normal attitude. They exhibited a marked passion for such external interests as flowers and ball dresses, and a reversion to the primitive amusements of singing and dancing.[9] The anticipation of these experiences was no less stimulating than the later diverting recollection of their significant points.

The subjects soon discovered that as they advanced in age, the same space of time seemed shorter. What had appeared ample opportunity for all desirable experiments dwindled into nothingness, to a sense of the unreal. The time for completing the records drew near, and much had been omitted. The memory of unfinished solutions of the problems of existence, the indeterminateness of the results of various vivid and emotional associations caused every individual deep pain, which manifested itself in a display of tears and osculation habitual to departing subjects.

So in due time—and all too short a space—they were dismissed from the field of investigation, bearing in almost all cases certificates testifying to the fact that, as far as scientific observation was concerned, they had arrived successfully at
